Though climate change is a pressing concern for all people and species, the most vulnerable communities and ecosystems suffer the largest share of the devastating impacts of a warming globe. The law must reshape current discourse on climate law and policy by addressing these inequitable effects while continuing innovative efforts to protect the environment, biodiversity, and human health. This free public symposium will host panel and keynote presentations to examine these critical issues through the lens of climate ethics, equity, and the law.

Sponsored by the Journal of Environmental Law and Litigation with the support of the Wayne Morse Center for Law and Politics and the Environmental and Natural Resources Law Program. CLE credits pending. For more information, contact Autumn Johnson, ajohnso3@uoregon.edu.
